Instructions: Read the passage and choose the correct answer (a, b, or c).

Multitasking: Busy Is Not Always Productive

Adam was preparing for his final examinations. He often studied with several browser tabs open while replying to messages and watching short videos. He believed that multitasking helped him finish more work. However, he frequently forgot what he had just read, and even simple homework took longer than expected.

One day, his teacher asked the class to complete a short activity. First, students answered questions while receiving phone notifications. Then they did a similar task with their phones silent. Most students, including Adam, made fewer mistakes during the second task. His teacher explained that switching attention between activities can interrupt concentration and reduce productivity.

Adam decided to change his routine. He wrote a study plan, put his phone away and worked on one subject for twenty-five minutes before taking a short break. He also kept a list of important tasks and checked them off as he finished. At first, the quiet study periods felt strange, but he soon found them effective.

By the end of the month, Adam had finished his revision without staying awake late every night. He learned that being busy is not always the same as working efficiently. Giving a task full attention can be more useful than trying to do many things at once.
